Imagine that the UK government had negotiated a deal to rejoin the European Union (EU), and was now holding a referendum on whether to rejoin under the terms of that deal, or to remain outside of the EU.

Such a deal would see…

[Responds were shown 3 random scenarios for the above question]

The UK become a member of the EU, including the single market and customs union, with free trade and freedom of movement between the UK and other EU countries, and voting rights in EU institutions.
The UK would have to join the Euro
The UK would have to join the Schengen passport-free travel zone
The UK would no longer have a discount on contributions to the EU budget like we had when we were previously a member

In these circumstances, would you vote to rejoin the EU, or vote to remain outside of the EU?

The UK become a member of the EU, including the single market and customs union, with free trade and freedom of movement between the UK and other EU countries, and voting rights in EU institutions
The UK would theoretically have to join the Euro at some point in the future, but in practice would not do so
The UK would have to join the Schengen passport-free travel zone
The UK would continue to have the same discount on contributions to the EU budget that we had when we were previously a member

In these circumstances, would you vote to rejoin the EU, or vote to remain outside of the EU?

The UK become a member of the EU, including the single market and customs union, with free trade and freedom of movement between the UK and other EU countries, and voting rights in EU institutions
The UK would not have to join the Euro
The UK would theoretically have to join the Schengen passport-free travel zone at some point in the future, but in practice would not do so
The UK would no longer have a discount on contributions to the EU budget like we had when we were previously a member

In these circumstances, would you vote to rejoin the EU, or vote to remain outside of the EU?
