A survey by the BBC suggests that the traditional class definitions of working, middle and upper have been replaced by seven new categories, based on their economic capital (their savings, income and home ownership), social capital (who they know and socialise with) and cultural capital (their hobbies and pastimes). Please read the descriptions below, and say which you think you would belong to?

Precariat, or precarious proletariat - the poorest, most deprived class, scoring low for social and cultural capital

Emergent service workers - a new, young, urban group which is relatively poor but has high social and cultural capital

Traditional working class - scores low on all forms of capital, but is not completely deprived. Its members have reasonably high house values, explained by this group having the oldest average age at 66

New affluent workers - a young class group which is socially and culturally active, with middling levels of economic capital

Technical middle class - a small, distinctive new class group which is prosperous but scores low for social and cultural capital. Distinguished by its social isolation and cultural apathy

Established middle class - the second wealthiest, scoring highly on all three capitals. The largest and most gregarious group, scoring second highest for cultural capital

Elite - the most privileged group in the UK, distinct from the other six classes through its wealth. This group has the highest levels of all three capitals

Sunderland AFC have recently appoint Paulo di Canio as their new manager. Di Canio was once banned for a match after making a fascist style salute during a match and said in an interview in 2005 that he was "a fascist". This week Di Canio has said "I am not political, I do not affiliate myself to any organisation. I am not a racist. I do not support the ideology of fascism."
