Earlier this year there was a court case where the defendant was a woman who wore a veil (the niqab) to cover her face for religious reasons. The judge had to make a ruling on whether she was allowed to wear the niqab during the trial

Current laws allow the government to impose "Terrorism Prevention and Investigation Measures" (Tpims) on people who they suspect pose a serious terrorist threat, but who they do not have evidence to prosecute. Tpims can restrict where suspects are allowed to go, require electronic tagging and a curfew and restrict internet and phone use. They do not require a trial and there are only limited rights of appeal.

Do you think the government should or should not have these powers?

Until 2011 the government could impose "control orders" on terrorist suspects. These were similar to the "Tpims" that replaced them, but had more extensive powers, including the ability to relocate suspects to a different part of the country, and greater powers to ban internet or phone use and who suspects could communicate with.

Do you believe the government should reintroduce control orders?
