Thinking about potential diplomatic, economic or military actions that Western countries should take in response to the situation in Ukraine, which of the following best reflects your view?

Western countries should take action of some sort to ensure that Ukraine is defended against any Russian aggression and keeps control of the Crimea
 The situation between Russia and the Ukraine does not affect the interests of Western countries, and we should leave Russia and the Ukraine to sort it out between themselves

Thinking about actions that Britain and the West could take against Russia, which of the following better reflects your view?

Russia's actions in the Ukraine are unacceptable; it is important that we work with other countries to impose economic sanctions against Russia, even if there is some limited cost to Britain's economy
 Russia's actions in the Ukraine do not directly affect Britain's interests, so we should not take any actions against them that might hurt Britain's economy at all, however slightly

The following questions are about organ donation. Currently England has an opt-in system, meaning that people's organs can only be used for transplants after their death if the person has consented (which they do through the NHS organ donation register). Wales is switching to an opt-out system, meaning that everyone's organs can be used for transplants after their death unless the person has indicated that they do NOT want to be a donor.
