The NHS reform risk register is a civil service document outlining the possible risks to NHS services from the government's proposed NHS reforms.

The Information Commissioner has ruled that the government should release this document under the Freedom of Information Act to make it accessible to MPs and the wider public. The government have appealed against this claiming that releasing it publicly would undermine the reforms and deter civil servants from speaking openly when developing policy.

Do you think the government should or should not release the NHS reform risk register?
