A UK law called the 'Investigatory Powers Act' was recently established, which requires Internet service providers to store the Internet connection records of every customer for the past year. These records include what websites were visited but not the particular web page or any action carried out on that web page. UK Government agencies are allowed to access these records (though not the content of messages) without a warrant for the purpose of law enforcement.

To what extent do you support or oppose this form of bulk data retention and access by UK Government agencies?

The Investigatory Powers Act also allows UK Government agencies to access data including the content of messages stored on specific computers, mobile devices and networks. This kind of targeted surveillance requires a warrant signed off by an independent judge.

To what extent do you support or oppose this form of targeted surveillance by UK Government agencies?

Still thinking about the Investigatory Powers Act, which one of the following statements, if either, best describes your view?

This act generally makes us all safer and is only something to worry about if you are doing something illegal	47	43	57	67	38	48	55	41	52	27	40	51	65	48	44	36	53	46	46	39
This act is something we should all be worried about for giving new surveillance powers to the state that could too easily be abused	31	38	25	16	39	37	30	41	21	33	34	31	22	31	30	38	24	31	30	45
Don't know/neither of these	23	19	17	17	23	15	16	18	27	41	26	18	13	21	25	26	22	23	24	15
