As you may know, the footballer Ryan Giggs had previously taken out an injunction preventing the media from identifying him as having had an affair with Imogen Thomas, a former Big Brother contestant. The injunction was broken by John Hemming MP, who named Giggs as the footballer concerned in the House of Commons, allowing the media to publish his name.

Do you think John Hemming was right or wrong to break the injunction?

In the United States the US constitution guarantees freedom of speech, with the result that media and newspapers in the USA have greater freedom to publish stories, injunctions like those seen here are not possible, and that it is much more difficult to sue someone for libel. Would you support or oppose a similar guarantee being put into British law?
